

Lady Mira and the Lost Golden Bell

Knight's story • 3-4 years old

Part 1

In a bright stone castle, Lady Mira the Kind Knight shined her silver helmet until it sparkled like morning. She was gentle, but she was also brave. She helped with doors, with baskets, and with worried hearts.

That day, the Great Hall looked strange. The round table was ready, the flags were ready, the candles were ready... but the golden bell was not ringing. The bell always rang for lunch, for songs, and for smiles.

Lady Mira bowed to the king and queen. "I will find the bell's brave sound," she said.

"Go with hope," said the queen.

Mira stepped onto the castle path. Her red cape fluttered softly. Her small pony, Pepper, trotted beside her. In her pocket she carried three things: a tiny map, a warm biscuit, and a little pouch of shiny seeds.

She met Old Gardener Bram near the roses. His face was calm, not scared. "The bell is not lost," he said. "It is only quiet."

"Quiet bells can be found," said Mira. "I will listen."

Part 2

Mira rode to the village. She asked kindly, "Did you see the golden bell?"

A baker wiped flour from his hands. "I heard a soft clink near the river bridge."

Mira rode to the bridge. She did not rush. She looked, she listened, she thought. Under the wooden boards, something gleamed.

But the boards were tight, and Mira was small. She took a deep breath. "Courage," she whispered. "And clever hands."

She laid her map on the ground. She used a stick to point. "If I lift this board a little, I can reach."

Pepper nudged her gently, as if to say, Try again.

Mira pulled, then rested, then pulled again. "I can do hard things," she said. "One try, then another."

At last the board lifted just enough. Mira reached in and touched cool gold. "Found you," she said softly.

Out came the bell—muddy, but safe. Its ribbon was stuck around a pebble. Mira untied it carefully. "There," she whispered. "Free again."

The bell gave a tiny ring. Not loud, not scary—just sweet.

Part 3

Mira washed the bell in the river. The water glimmered. She shook it once. Ring-ring! It sounded like sunshine.

On the way home, she scattered her shiny seeds by the path. "For new flowers," she said. "Hope grows here."

Back at the castle, everyone gathered. Mira held the bell up high. "The bell was only waiting," she said. "And we did not give up."

The king smiled wide. "Lady Mira, you are brave and wise."

The queen hugged her close. "And full of hope."

Mira rang the bell. Ring-ring! Lunch came, songs came, smiles came. Pepper munched a biscuit. Lady Mira sat at the round table, warm and safe, ready for the next bright quest.
