

Barnaby Bear and the Quiet Signs Treasure Hunt

Hidden treasure story • 11-12 years old

Chapter 1: The Map That Wasn't a Map

Barnaby Bear did not believe in “lucky accidents.” He believed in muddy paws, careful thinking, and checking things twice.

So when he found a shiny tin tucked under a loose root near the riverbank, he didn't cheer. He squinted.

“This is either wonderful,” he muttered, “or it's going to make my week complicated.”

The tin was the size of a biscuit box and smelled faintly of peppermint and old paper. Barnaby carried it home to his den under the great oak, set it on his table, and opened it like it might bite.

Inside were four things:

A brass button shaped like a compass rose.

A strip of blue cloth with tiny stitched stars.

A smooth stone with a carved spiral.

And a note written in neat, looping letters:

ONLY A CLEAR HEAD CAN FIND WHAT A GREEDY ONE MISSES.

COLLECT THE PIECES. BUILD THE PUZZLE. FOLLOW THE QUIET SIGNS.

Barnaby read it twice. Then a third time, because he was the sort of bear who respected warnings.

“It's a treasure hunt,” he said, trying to sound calm.

His stomach did a small somersault anyway.

Outside, the afternoon breeze jostled the leaves. Somewhere in the woods, a woodpecker drummed like a ticking clock. Barnaby held the brass button up to the light. In the center, a tiny arrow was etched so delicately it was almost invisible.

He turned the button, and the arrow didn't point north.

It pointed... toward the old stone bridge.

Barnaby's ears perked. "All right. You win, mysterious note."

He tucked the four items into a pouch and set out. He wasn't going to charge through the forest like a hero in a story. He would walk briskly and think.

At the bridge, moss clung to the stones like thick green frosting. Barnaby leaned on the railing and looked down at the water racing under it.

A voice behind him said, "If you're thinking of jumping, I'd rate it a terrible idea."

Barnaby turned. A fox stood there, bright-eyed and smug, holding an apple.

"I'm not jumping," Barnaby said. "I'm investigating."

The fox took a bite. "Investigating what?"

Barnaby hesitated. His mother had always told him, Wise secrets stay in safe pockets. But another saying floated up too: Wisdom knows when to ask for help.

"I found... something," Barnaby admitted. "A puzzle. Possibly treasure."

The fox's ears lifted. "Treasure, you say?"

Barnaby watched the fox's tail flick. "Possibly. But it's more like... clues. Are you going to be a problem?"

The fox looked offended. "Me? Problem? I'm Felix. I'm a solution. I solve things. Mostly for myself."

Barnaby sighed. "Fine, Felix. But you follow my rules. We don't rush. We don't grab. We don't get ourselves eaten."

Felix swallowed his apple bite. "Agreed. I also prefer not being eaten. It's unfashionable."

Together they searched the bridge. Barnaby studied the compass-button again. The etched arrow pointed to a stone on the far side—one shaped like a tooth.

Felix crouched. "There's a crack."

Barnaby pressed the spiral stone against the crack. It fit like it had been waiting for years. With a soft click, a slim drawer slid out of the bridge stone.

Inside lay a fifth piece: a shard of green glass, triangular, like part of a window.

Barnaby held it up. Sunlight turned it into a slice of emerald.

Felix whistled. "That's not ordinary."

"No," Barnaby said softly. "And we're not done."

He tucked the green shard away. Somewhere, hidden in these woods, more pieces were waiting—pieces that would reveal where the treasure slept.

And Barnaby Bear, clear-headed and curious, was officially in for a complicated week.

Chapter 2: The Singing Stones

The next clue didn't come as a screaming sign or a glowing arrow. It came as silence.

That night, Barnaby spread the pieces on his table: brass button, blue cloth, spiral stone, green glass, and the note. They didn't fit together yet, but they seemed to belong to the same story—like characters from different pages looking for the same book.

Felix sprawled on Barnaby's rug like he lived there. "So what now?"

Barnaby ran a claw along the stitched stars on the cloth. "The note said 'quiet signs.' That means subtle things. Things you notice only if you stop rushing."

Felix rolled onto his back. "I am excellent at stopping. I stop all the time."

"You stop to nap," Barnaby said.

Felix grinned. "A strategic pause."

Barnaby studied the green glass. Along one edge, tiny scratches formed a pattern—short, long, short, long. Like someone had tried to write a message without letters.

"Could be a code," Barnaby murmured.

Felix sat up. "Or teeth marks."

Barnaby gave him a look.

"All right, code," Felix conceded. "What does it say?"

Barnaby held the glass near the candle. The scratches caught the light, and suddenly Barnaby saw it—between the scratches, faint lines etched deeper, nearly invisible.

Not a code. A map.

A curve for the river. A notch for the old bridge. And three dots near a place marked with a tiny drawing of... stones.

"The Singing Stones," Barnaby said.

Felix's nose twitched. "I've heard of them. Big boulders in a circle. If you tap them right, they ring."

"Then that's where we go."

Morning brought mist and damp fur. The forest looked washed clean, and spiderwebs glittered like lace. Barnaby and Felix followed the river path until the trees thinned and the stones appeared—seven huge boulders arranged in a rough circle, each one streaked with pale quartz.

Felix hopped onto a rock and tapped it with a stick. It answered with a dull thud.

"That's not much of a song," he said.

Barnaby stepped into the circle and listened. The air felt different here, as if it held its breath.

He pulled out the brass button-compass. The tiny arrow spun once and pointed at the tallest stone, which had a thin crack like a smile.

Barnaby approached it and placed the blue cloth against the crack. The stitched stars shimmered faintly, as if the morning light had turned mischievous.

Felix blinked. "Did it just... glow?"

Barnaby pressed the cloth deeper into the crack. A hidden groove accepted it, and the stone gave a quiet hum—low and steady, like the beginning of a song.

Then, one by one, the other stones answered. Not loudly. Not magically loud. Just enough that Barnaby felt the sound in his bones.

Felix whispered, “I’m getting goosebumps. I don’t even have goose.”

Barnaby searched the ground near the humming stone. His paw brushed something cold and smooth: a metal ring buried under leaves.

He tugged, and a small lid popped open in the base of the boulder. Inside lay the sixth piece: a wooden tile, carved with half of a sun.

Barnaby’s heart beat faster. “We’re getting closer.”

Felix stared at the tile. “So the treasure is real.”

Barnaby nodded. “But we need the whole puzzle. Rushing now would be like trying to read a book by tearing out the last page.”

Felix looked troubled for exactly two seconds. Then he said, “I hate when people do that.”

Barnaby tucked the wooden sun tile away. The stones continued humming, gentle as a lullaby.

As they left the circle, Barnaby glanced back. The sound faded behind them, but the feeling stayed: the forest was not just watching. It was guiding.

And somewhere ahead, another quiet sign waited to be noticed.

Chapter 3: The Riddle in the Storm

The third clue arrived disguised as bad weather.

By afternoon, clouds rolled in like dark wool blankets. The forest grew dim, and the air smelled of wet bark. Felix, who had been cheerful all morning, started to glance up nervously.

“I don’t mind rain,” he announced, too loudly. “Rain is... refreshing.”

Barnaby lifted an eyebrow. “You’re afraid of thunderstorms.”

“I am not afraid,” Felix said. “I simply dislike being surprised by loud sky noises.”

A distant rumble answered him, as if the sky had heard and found it funny.

Barnaby stopped under a pine tree. “We need shelter.”

They hurried until they spotted an old watchtower on a hill—just a stone base now, with a slanted roof patched by time. Barnaby pushed the door, and it groaned open.

Inside, it smelled of dust and pine sap. A small window looked out over the forest, and a rusty lantern hung from a beam.

Felix shook rain from his ears. “This place feels like it has a secret.”

Barnaby smiled slightly. “Most old places do.”

Lightning flashed. For an instant, the room turned bright as noon. In that flash, Barnaby saw scratches on the floorboards—lines and symbols etched into the wood.

When the thunder boomed, Felix yelped and pretended it was a cough. “Ahem! Dust.”

Barnaby crouched. The scratches formed a riddle, written in a mix of symbols and plain letters:

WHEN WATER FALLS,

LOOK FOR WHAT DOES NOT WET.

WHEN WIND HOWLS,

LISTEN FOR WHAT DOES NOT SPEAK.

Felix peered over Barnaby's shoulder. "That's... dramatic."

"It's instructions," Barnaby said. "A quiet sign hidden in loud weather."

Rain hammered the roof. Wind shoved at the walls. Barnaby looked around the room carefully. What does not wet... what does not speak...

His eyes landed on the rusty lantern. It hung dry beneath the beam, protected from the rain.

Barnaby reached for it. The lantern was heavier than it looked. As he lifted it, something clinked inside the base—too solid to be loose rust.

Felix scooted closer. "Open it!"

Barnaby turned the lantern over and found a small screw cap. He unscrewed it slowly, because impatience was how you broke things—and sometimes yourself.

Inside the lantern base, wrapped in oilcloth, was the seventh piece: another wooden tile, carved with the other half of the sun.

Barnaby held the two tiles together. They clicked into place, forming a complete circle, with a tiny notch at the top.

“A puzzle piece,” Barnaby said, delighted despite the storm.

Felix’s eyes glittered. “That notch looks like it connects to something else.”

Barnaby laid out the growing collection on the floor: the complete sun tile, the green glass shard, the spiral stone, the brass button, the blue star cloth.

The sun tile’s notch aligned perfectly with the point of the green glass triangle.

Barnaby tested it. The wood and glass fit snugly, like a door fitting its frame. Together they formed a strange emblem: sun and window, warmth and mystery.

Another lightning flash lit the room. For a blink, the emblem reflected the light onto the wall—projecting a faint pattern, like a shadow-map.

Barnaby leaned in. The pattern showed a path, bending past the river and toward the cliffs at the edge of the forest—cliffs with caves.

Felix swallowed. “Caves. Wonderful. Caves are famous for being... not bright.”

Barnaby patted his shoulder. “Courage isn’t being fearless. It’s being scared and going anyway.”

Felix sighed. “I was hoping courage was more like... being brave from far away.”

Thunder grumbled again, but softer now, like it was losing interest. The storm began to drift off.

Barnaby packed the pieces carefully. “We go at first light.”

Felix stared at the dark window. “If we find treasure, I want my share.”

Barnaby looked at him. “If we find treasure, we do it wisely.”

Felix opened his mouth, then closed it. He wasn’t sure what “wisely” meant yet—but something in Barnaby’s steady voice made him want to try.

Outside, the rain eased into a whisper. Inside, the puzzle had spoken without speaking, and the next step was clear.

The cliffs were calling.

Chapter 4: The Cave of Echoes

At dawn, the world smelled new. The storm had scrubbed the leaves clean, and puddles held pieces of the sky.

Barnaby and Felix followed the projected path. The forest grew rockier, and roots twisted over stones like giant fingers. By late morning, they reached the cliffs—gray walls rising steeply, patched with lichen and dotted with dark openings.

Felix craned his neck. “So many holes. How do we pick the right one without getting swallowed by the mountain?”

Barnaby pulled out the brass button-compass. The etched arrow pointed unshakably at the smallest cave entrance, half hidden behind a curtain of ivy.

“That one,” Barnaby said.

Felix sighed like a fox walking into a dentist’s office. “Of course it’s the creepiest one.”

The cave mouth smelled damp and cold. Barnaby stepped in first. The floor sloped gently downward, and their paws made soft scrapes on the stone. Light faded quickly behind them.

Felix whispered, “Do you hear that?”

Barnaby listened. A faint dripping sound. And something else—an echo, as if the cave repeated even their breathing.

Barnaby took the green-glass-and-sun emblem from his pouch. When he held it up, a thin beam of morning light, sneaking through the ivy, passed through the green glass and painted a pale emerald stripe onto the cave wall.

The stripe landed on a symbol carved into the stone—a spiral.

Barnaby smiled. “We’re on the right track.”

He pressed the spiral stone into the carved spiral. It fit. The wall shivered—just a little, like a door deciding whether it trusted you.

A panel slid open with a grinding sigh, revealing a narrow passage and, on the ground, a metal plaque with words etched into it:

TAKE ONLY WHAT YOU CAN CARRY WITH KINDNESS.

LEAVE BEHIND WHAT MAKES YOU HEAVY.

Felix read it and frowned. “That’s... insulting. I’m not heavy.”

Barnaby gave him a sideways look. “It doesn’t mean your body.”

Felix’s ears drooped. “Oh.”

They moved into the narrow passage. It twisted, and the echoes turned trickier. Sometimes it sounded like footsteps behind them. Felix kept looking over his shoulder.

Barnaby stayed calm, but his heart thumped. He reminded himself: Panic makes bad choices. Breathe. Observe.

The passage opened into a chamber where the ceiling glittered with tiny crystals. In the center stood a stone pedestal. On it sat a flat board of dark wood—like the base of a puzzle.

The board had grooves: one for the brass button, one for the blue cloth, one for the green glass emblem, and a few empty spaces shaped like things they hadn't found yet.

Felix whispered, "We're missing pieces."

Barnaby nodded. "But the board is here. That means the rest are near."

As if answering him, the cave echoed with a new sound: a soft clicking, like pebbles tapping together.

Felix froze. "That's not dripping."

From the shadows, a small creature stepped forward—a mountain raven, black feathers glossy, eyes sharp as pins. It hopped onto the pedestal, tilting its head.

Barnaby spoke gently. "Hello."

The raven croaked. Then, in a surprisingly clear voice, it said, "Puzzle. Pieces. Pay."

Felix's mouth fell open. "It talks."

"Ravens are clever," Barnaby whispered back. "And this one is guarding something."

The raven hopped closer, staring at Barnaby's pouch. "Shiny. Give."

Felix bristled. "No way! We worked for those!"

Barnaby raised a paw. "We don't want a fight."

He studied the raven. Guards didn't always want treasure. Sometimes they wanted proof you understood the rules.

Barnaby took out the brass button and held it up. "This is shiny. But it's also part of the puzzle."

The raven's eyes followed it. "Give."

Barnaby thought of the plaque: Take only what you can carry with kindness. Leave behind what makes you heavy.

Greed would make him heavy. Fear would too.

Barnaby set the brass button gently on the pedestal—not in the puzzle groove, but beside it, like an offering of trust.

"I'm not giving it away," Barnaby said calmly. "I'm showing you I'm not here to snatch and run."

The raven stared. It hopped in a circle, clicked its beak twice, then leaned down and nudged the button into the correct groove on the puzzle board.

Felix exhaled. "I think it accepted you."

The raven flapped once, then hopped off the pedestal and disappeared into the shadows. A moment later, something clattered onto the stone floor near Barnaby's feet.

A small bone-white tile, carved with half of a crescent moon.

Barnaby picked it up. "A trade," he murmured. "Not for the button. For the attitude."

Felix looked embarrassed. "So the treasure hunt is... also a lesson."

Barnaby smiled. “Most good adventures are.”

They placed the moon tile into its matching groove on the board. The board gave a soft click, and a new groove opened—pointing deeper into the cave.

Felix swallowed. “More cave.”

Barnaby adjusted his pouch. “More puzzle.”

They walked on, their shadows stretching ahead—brave enough to move, wise enough to watch.

Chapter 5: The Bridge of Lost Steps

The next chamber was wider, and the air tasted like minerals and old rain. A narrow stone bridge crossed a deep crack in the ground. The crack swallowed sound; when a pebble fell, it made no clink at all.

Felix peered over the edge and pulled back fast. “Nope. The ground is missing.”

Barnaby knelt by the entrance. On the wall, another message was carved, faint and chipped:

COUNT YOUR STEPS, NOT YOUR FEARS.

THE WRONG NUMBER LEADS YOU NOWHERE.

Felix groaned. “I hate counting. Counting is what happens when fun is forbidden.”

Barnaby stood, steadying himself. “This is a test. We do it carefully.”

In the center of the bridge was a small stone plate with shallow holes—like it could hold something. Above it, carved into the arching cave ceiling, were symbols that looked like footprints and... stars.

Barnaby took out the blue cloth. The stitched stars matched the ceiling pattern exactly: seven small stars, two larger ones, and a crooked line between.

Felix leaned in. "So... seven steps, then two?"

Barnaby shook his head. "Not that simple. The crooked line means a pause. And these footprints—some are deeper. Different weights."

They watched the bridge. Certain stones were slightly darker, dampened by seeping water. Barnaby tapped them with a claw. Some rang solid; others sounded hollow.

Felix whispered, "Hollow sounds are bad."

"Probably," Barnaby agreed. "So we choose the solid ones."

Barnaby placed the blue cloth on the stone plate at the bridge's center. The cloth settled into the holes as if they were made for it. The stitched stars seemed to sink, and the cloth tightened—becoming like a strap holding the plate in place.

A faint line appeared along the bridge stones: a trail of tiny etched dots, leading in a winding pattern.

Felix blinked. "It's showing us the safe path!"

Barnaby nodded. "Quiet signs."

They crossed slowly, stepping only where the dotted trail led. Barnaby counted under his breath, matching each step to the star pattern: seven careful steps, pause, two steps, pause, then a final crooked step to the left.

Halfway over, Felix's paw slipped toward a hollow stone. Barnaby caught him by the scruff.

Felix squeaked, then recovered and tried to sound dignified. “I meant to test your reflexes.”

Barnaby grunted. “Next time, test them on flat ground.”

They reached the far side, and the bridge gave a satisfied little rumble—as if it approved of being taken seriously.

Beyond the bridge was a small alcove with another pedestal. On it sat a second bone-white tile, carved with the other half of the crescent moon.

Felix’s eyes widened. “We have the whole moon now!”

Barnaby fit the two halves together. They clicked and formed a complete crescent with a tiny hole near its tip—like it was meant to hang from something.

Barnaby placed the completed moon tile into his pouch, feeling the weight of progress.

Felix glanced back at the bridge. “So if we’d rushed—”

“We would have fallen,” Barnaby finished. “Or gotten stuck.”

Felix’s voice softened. “Thanks for catching me.”

Barnaby gave a small nod. “Teamwork is also wisdom.”

Felix smiled, a bit sheepish. “Don’t tell anyone I said something sensible.”

They followed the cave passage as it climbed upward. The air warmed slightly, and a faint smell drifted in—sun-warmed grass.

Barnaby’s heart lifted. An exit was near.

And so was the final piece, he could feel it, like the last page of a book waiting to be turned.

Chapter 6: The Puzzle That Points

They emerged from the cave onto a ledge overlooking the forest. The world outside was bright and wide, and Barnaby took a deep breath as if he'd been holding it for hours.

Felix stretched dramatically. "I missed daylight. Darkness makes my fur look too serious."

On the ledge, half hidden in grass, stood a weathered stone box with a lid. On top of it was carved the same emblem Barnaby had built: sun and green glass.

Barnaby knelt. "This is it."

The lid didn't open with brute force. It had slots—exactly the shapes of the items Barnaby had collected.

He and Felix laid everything out like sacred tools: brass button, blue star cloth, spiral stone, sun-and-glass emblem, and the crescent moon tile.

Barnaby placed them one by one into the lid's slots. Each piece settled with a soft, precise click, like a well-made lock enjoying its job.

Felix held his breath. "Do it."

Barnaby placed the final piece—the crescent moon—into its place.

For a moment, nothing happened.

Then the pieces shifted. Not much—just enough to slide into a new arrangement. Lines between them lit up faintly, etched grooves catching the sunlight. Together they formed a complete picture: a map made of symbols rather than roads.

Barnaby leaned close. At the center was a drawing of the old oak—his oak—marked with a tiny hook symbol.

Felix gasped. “Your den!”

Barnaby’s mind raced. “Not inside. Under it. Something near the roots.”

Felix looked thrilled and alarmed at the same time. “We’re practically sitting on the treasure and didn’t even know!”

Barnaby closed the stone box gently. “The puzzle didn’t want someone who charges in. It wanted someone who notices, thinks, and returns home without forgetting kindness.”

Felix nodded slowly. “Also someone who can tolerate my personality.”

Barnaby snorted. “That may be the hardest test of all.”

They hurried back through the forest, not reckless, but fast enough that the wind whistled past their ears. Birds scattered. Leaves slapped their shoulders. The oak came into view like an old friend, sturdy and calm.

At its base, Barnaby found the loose root where he’d discovered the tin. But now, with the puzzle’s map in mind, he searched a little to the left—where a small hook symbol would be, if symbols could be real.

Felix crouched beside him. “Do you see anything?”

Barnaby brushed away soil and leaves. His claw struck something metal.

A small iron hook was anchored into a stone set in the ground—so old it had been swallowed by dirt. Hanging from the hook was a plain ring of bronze.

Barnaby's breath caught. "A key."

Felix whispered, awed despite himself. "On a hook."

Barnaby lifted it carefully. It was cool and solid, with a simple carved notch shaped like a crescent moon.

He looked at Felix, eyes bright. "This is the ending of the puzzle."

Felix looked around, suddenly cautious. "Or the beginning of the treasure."

Barnaby held the key in his paw, feeling its weight—not heavy with greed, but heavy with possibility.

The note's words came back to him: Only a clear head can find what a greedy one misses.

Barnaby nodded to himself. "We'll use it wisely."

Felix smirked. "Define wisely."

Barnaby smiled, gentle and certain. "We'll find what it opens. And whatever we discover, we'll remember the rules: courage, patience, and kindness."

Above them, the oak's leaves rustled as if approving.

And there, exactly as promised by the adventure's strange, quiet signs, the story ended with a key on a hook—waiting for the next brave, wise choice.

The quiz: did you understand the story well?

1) What precise clue on the brass button helped Barnaby find the old stone bridge?

- A tiny arrow etched in the center that pointed toward the bridge
- A map engraved on the back showing the river and bridge
- A compass needle that always pointed north
- A secret word written around the edge

2) How did Barnaby and Felix make the Singing Stones reveal the hidden compartment?

- They placed the blue cloth into a crack and let the stones hum in response
- They smashed one stone to open the hollow inside
- They sang loudly until a stone rolled aside
- They poured water into a groove to wash away moss

3) What lesson was written on the metal plaque inside the cave before they met the raven?

- TAKE ONLY WHAT YOU CAN CARRY WITH KINDNESS. LEAVE BEHIND WHAT MAKES YOU HEAVY.
- BRAVERY IS TAKEN, NOT GIVEN. FIGHT FOR WHAT YOU WANT.
- KEEP QUIET AND MOVE FAST. TREASURE FAVORS THE SWIFT.
- IF YOU LIE, THE CAVE WILL CLOSE. TELL THE TRUTH ALWAYS.

4) Why did Barnaby place the brass button on the pedestal instead of handing it to the raven?

- To show he was not there to snatch and to prove respectful intentions
- Because he wanted the raven to wear the button as a prize
- He thought the button would explode if touched
- He wanted to trick the raven into leaving the cave

5) How did Barnaby and Felix safely cross the Bridge of Lost Steps?

- They followed a dotted trail revealed by the blue cloth and counted steps according to the star pattern
- They hopped across using Felix's long jumps to test each stone first
- They tied a rope to the oak and used it to swing across
- They waited until the crack closed and walked across together

6) What indicated the final location of the key and how was the key shaped?

- The completed puzzle on the stone box projected a symbol of Barnaby's oak; the key had a crescent-moon notch
- A raven's song described a hidden pond; the key was shaped like a fish
- The lantern's light pointed to an old well; the key was square with a sun mark
- A map inside the tin showed a hilltop; the key was a twisted iron spiral

Correct answers:

1) A tiny arrow etched in the center that pointed toward the bridge 2) They placed the blue cloth into a crack and let the stones hum in response 3) TAKE ONLY WHAT YOU CAN CARRY WITH KINDNESS. LEAVE BEHIND WHAT MAKES YOU HEAVY. 4) To show he was not there to snatch and to prove respectful intentions 5) They followed a dotted trail revealed by the blue cloth and counted steps according to the star pattern 6) The completed puzzle on the stone box projected a symbol of Barnaby's oak; the key had a crescent-moon notch

Glossary: complicated words in the story

Peppermint: A strong mint flavor or smell, like the taste in some candies and sweets.

Compass rose: A circle marking on maps showing directions like north, south, east, and west.

Etched: Cut or scratched a design or letters into a hard surface, leaving a clear mark.

Spiral: A shape that winds around and around, getting farther from the center each turn.

Groove: A long, narrow hollow cut into a surface, where something can fit or slide.

Hum: A low, steady sound that is soft and continuous, like a quiet engine or bees.

Lullaby: A gentle song sung to help someone fall asleep or feel calm.

Strategic pause: A deliberate short stop used to think carefully before doing the next thing.

Oilcloth: A strong cloth covered with oil to make it waterproof and protect objects inside.

Alcove: A small recessed area or niche in a room or wall, often used for objects or seats.

Pedestal: A raised base or support on which an object, like a statue or box, stands.

Plaque: A flat metal or stone plate that often has words or designs carved on it.

Hollow: An empty or sunken space inside something, making it feel light or sound different.

Echoed: When a sound is repeated because it bounces off walls, caves, or large spaces.